Success...One Step at a Time by Bryssa Koppie, Daily Work social work intern

One of the most difficult parts of being an intern at Daily Work is how difficult and lengthy job searches can be. Sometimes, it takes more than an hour to apply for one job - not including resume tweaking, cover letter editing, making follow-up phone calls, etc.

While many jobs are found in public postings, it can be a time consuming and risky endeavor, as you will learn about by reading about Fassil's job search by clicking here:

Using traditional job search strategies and applying for announced positions, Daily Work successfully places 30 percent of our job seekers, but our goal is to do much better than that. We know, the best positions are often come by through word of mouth and networking, which is why you, as board members, members of our partner churches, donors, and other supporters are a crucial piece of the job search puzzle. As you read about Fassil's job search process, think about your connections and how they may help a hard worker like Fassil.

Join us for a powerful hour of stories of hope and success.

Together, we can climb!
